Transparency in Transcribing: Making Visible Theoretical Bases of Knowledge Construction from Open-Ended Interviews

Audra Skukauskaite

Abstract

This article presents a reflexive analysis of two transcripts of an open-ended interview, focusing on the role of transparency in transcribing processes and outcomes. By analyzing ways in which transcripts become consequential in producing and using transcripts of an open-ended interview, the article makes visible the importance of examining and presenting theoretical bases of research. As researchers across disciplines have argued that transcribing is a theoretically laden process (e.g., Kvale & Brinkman, 1997; Kvale & Brinkman, 2009), few have engaged in reflexive analysis of the consequences of particular theoretical and methodological approaches to transcribing and inciting dialogues across traditions. The article demonstrates how transparency in transcribing influence research transparency and warrantability.
