For the past century, the field of Mediterranean Studies has been primarily dominated by two paradigms that appear mutually exclusive: the bifurcated Mediterranean of the battlefield, and the linked Mediterranean suggested by the other places of encounter and exchange. But when the dotted lines separating the color-coded civilizations inscribed are erased, when we begin to question and to breach its boundaries, new patterns of interaction materialize which many cherished assumptions about the sea, and about familiar and time-worn categories such as east and west, Christian and Christian. In their place we are able to perceive a more nuanced and complex world of contention, as well as a coexistence.
