This article applies Diehl & Druckman's peace operation evaluation framework to the activities of the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) during the Liberian transitional peace process (2003-2006). It finds that in general UNMIL performed strongly during the process, particularly in relation to the core mission goals of violence abatement, conflict containment, and conflict settlement. However, UNMIL's achievements were less clear and less pronounced in relation to the more complex areas of non-traditional mission goals. The article also provides critical reflections on the framework for evaluating peace operations, arguing that it that influence the activities of peacekeeping and peacebuilding.
