Abstract

Child protection workers often concentrate upon mothers, and ignore or avoid fathers and male cohabitants. This article attempts to explore such tendencies, with the help of literature, research and the author's own experiences. It asks: when does this ignoring and avoidance take place? How and why is it done, and what are the likely consequences for child, mother, father/male partner, and child protection worker? It suggests that ignoring or avoiding men constitutes a serious problem in child protection work. It makes suggestions on how trainers and managers may prepare workers more effectively, enabling them to engage men who are significant in the lives of abused children.
