Description Many scholars have argued that the idea of wilderness is a cultural construction. Environmental historians have outlined how the idea of wilderness has changed over time, but few scholars have considered the role of non-“unspoiled” and “unconquerable,” tropical forests have long been called “the Jungle,” a phrase film-makers Martin and Osa Johnson used to describe their representation of tropical landscapes (along with their animals) in their 1942 film Jungle. In the place in both the history of the idea of nature and the global history of the idea of wilderness. As a cultural construction, “the Jungle” is a dynamic mixture of ideas. In the late nineteenth century, the Jungle was a popular theme in American culture. In 1914, Rudyard Kipling’s The Jungle (1914) and Merian C. Cooper’s King Kong (1933) created a popular image of the Jungle. While the popular image of the Jungle masked many of the
