Abstract

In the 2006 article "The Blog Phenomenon and the Book Publ in Publishing Research Quarterly, Meredith Nelson begins to c blogs would go on to have on the book publishing industry ov Since Nelson's article, little more scholarly work has broached blogs specifically, but in an industry that has remained remarkable for years, it's no surprise that much of Nelson's research still points to the same conclusion: Marketing budgets are shrinking, attention spans are waning, and the digital world will be—incredibly subjective. If books in a digital world are to succeed, "it's very important that marketers find populations of people who will engage with their books". That is where publishers and authors should focus.

Research Question: As publishing houses' marketing budgets continue to shrink, will blogs become an increasingly common tool for book promotion, and if so, will they either support or disprove the claim that blog tours are an effective way to increase book sales and connecting with readers?
