Abstract:

This paper considers how the Communist dictatorship in Albania employed material symbols to help impose its control on the population. We illustrate the eventual demise of these strategies of domination, by describing what has become of specific elements of Communist material culture (bunkers) in a post-Communist landscape, and by discussing the use of an individual artifact (a second-century AD architectural block) as a symbol of resistance during Communism and its beginnings in the post-Communist era. Rather than presenting substantive archaeological data, this paper explores the treatment of material culture in newly open post-Communist countries like Albania can stimulate archaeological formation and manipulation of landscapes and the interplay between domination and resistance as an agent of change.
