Abstract:

This article provides an extremely influential account of how the Black church has played a significant role as a change amongst the Blacks in the USA from the days of slavery to date. Dating back from the 1800s, Blacks in the USA were often oppressed and controlled by the slave masters - Whites, if they were caught reading or attempting to learn how to read (C-Span B February, 2005). However, it is common knowledge that most African Americans found solace in the Black church. Churches could be held in buildings or by the river banks, a practice that is still found in isolated parts of Zimbabwe today among indigenous groups that are called the: "Mapositori" in the Shona vernacular language whose literal translation is "Apostles". During the slave era in the USA, a place of worship was not only utilized as a venue to fellowship in the presence of God through Jesus Christ, but it was also used as a convenient comfort zone to discuss politics and thereby share ideas needed for survival amidst the prevailing social injustices and hurdles that they found themselves in on a daily basis.
