This study compares the personality profile of male leaders connected with twelve apostolic networks of churches with the personality profile of Church of England clergymen. It makes a further comparison with the UK population norms. Data provided by 162 leaders of apostolic networks demonstrated that, compared with the Church of England clergymen, they were more likely to prefer extraversion. Compared with the UK male population norms, these leaders were more likely to prefer extraversion, intuition, fe implications of these findings are discussed for ministry and mission.
