Title: In the Midst of Life: Affect and Ideation in the World of the Tolai

Author(s): Michel Panoff .

Source: Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute.

Document Type: Book review

Article Preview :

This is an important book, so scholarly and so humane at the same time. In an unassuming way typical of its author it crowns thirty years of research and publications on the Tolai people of New Britain. It breaks ground for a new field of inquiry: namely, to integrate the study of emotions into anthropological research. Epstein's prime mover was Bateson (Naven 1936) claiming that human populations are distinguished not only by their social arrangements or their cultural styles, but also by their emotional profiles (p. 20). After stressing the main obstacles to his venture, such as the cultural tradition of the West opposing reason and emotion, the participation of bodily processes in many affective states, the deterrence of Durkheim's concern to assert the sui generis status of social phenomena, etc., he addresses himself to the task of devising a method for exploring affect. In graphic wording he sees his job as 'akin to the peeling of an onion', removing layer after layer, starting with the level of ideation (the Tolai lexicon of emotional terms, their established categories) through the physical expression of emotions in...
