Is it possible to maintain hope, when massive forces are arrayed against us? Reading Nancy Hollander's Uprooted Minds: Surviving the Politics of Terror in the Americas, this question comes to mind. In this work, Hollander peels away our remaining illusions about a just world. Interweaving history, political/economic/cultural critique, and psychoanalysis, she exposes the covert power structures that have dominated the Americas for decades. These are ruthless forms of capitalism that deprive their citizens while imbued with hatred and terror. To Hollander, these forms of government have dominated both North and South America. She makes this case persuasively. Hollander is both a psychoanalyst and a social activist. She has spent years exposing, and examining, the authoritarian regimes of South America. In this, and in her prior work (Hatred), she unpacks the inner workings of these authoritarian regimes. She asks hard questions: How do these regimes gain force and power? How do they terrorize, bewilder, starve, and immobilize an entire population? In studying these questions, Hollander applies an interdisciplinary lens. Freudian and Kleinian theories illuminate the structure, and functioning, of these governments. But this author also has a very thorough understanding of economic, social, and political history; for Hollander, this history is inseparable from her psychoanalytic investigation. Indeed, this book makes a formidable, if secondary argument: that psychoanalysis has the potential to illuminate social consciousness, and cultural critique.
