Abstract

Racial minorities in the U.S. are often tormented by the tension between the social and the ontological, with the former experienced as confining and the latter as liberating. Such ambivalence often expresses itself in one s relationship with food. This article illustrates how Jacques Lacan s psychoanalytical theory on the subject of the Other can be used to understand ethnicity as a bodily performance, which I venture to call "ontological performance." Applying this concept to Bich Minh Nguyen's Stealing Buddha's Dinner,
