Abstract:

While the use of career coaching has grown tremendously over the past several years, there has been little research on whether career coaching should be implemented in organizational settings and only anecdotal evidence on its effectiveness. This article examines the distinctiveness of career coaching versus other career developmental activities (e.g., mentoring and career counseling), the indicators diagnosing the need for career coaching, and the organizational circumstances under which career coaching is most successfully utilized. The article concludes with guidelines to assist senior managers and HR professionals in effectively implementing career coaching.
