Abstract : Pacific Island countries and territories are not producers of the greenhouse gases that contribute to changes in climatic conditions. Yet they are a victim of the circumstances and of other nations' uncontrolled appetite for development in the regard for the long term environmental consequences. This article gives an overview of the threats posed by climate change to the health of Pacific Island people, d regions' current situation. Exposure to extreme weather conditions, altered disease, and damage to health infrastructures are some of the climate changes considered. Suggestions to address cited climate change impacts are presented.
