Abstract:

Much research has been conducted on the communication patterns and processes in families consist of more or less members. What I have tried to generate is some discussion of communication in a larger family. I chose to use my family of thirteen members as my source for information and I have applied four theories that have been previously created in the studies of much smaller families, to relevant events in my family. The theories are: Turning points, dialectical tensions, working and non-working relationships, and diluted communication. From this study I have drawn many conclusions about large-family communication through its various periods of growth.
