Abstract:

---

Using research conducted in North America and England, the author explores the reality of interchurch vis-a-vis the four "marks" of the Church, concluding that indeed such families can rightly be called churches" in their own right.

Description:

Within this thesis, an interchurch family includes a husband and wife who come from two different traditions (often a Roman Catholic married to a Christian of another communion). Both of them retain their original church membership, but so far as they are able they are committed to live, worship and participate in their spouse's church also. If they have children, as parents they exercise a joint responsibility under the guidance of their religious and spiritual upbringing, and they teach them by word and example to appreciate and live by Christian traditions.
