The passive-aggressive component of the Mexican modal personality can be traced to the dominant and harshly p the general authoritarian nature of the Mexican culture. This passive-aggressiveness is perpetuated in the macho in the "martyr" pattern of the Mexican female. Any acting out of the resultant hostility to authority must be carried from that authority's immediate control. The bullfight is seen to depict, symbolically, the power of the father, the s and the fear of the child. Unlike the family situation, the awesome authority does not prevail, but rather is domina courage and daring of the matador. He, however, acting for the spectator, must accomplish this hostile act in a fra and with a studied passiveness in and control of movement. By contrast, the "intellectualization" component of th traced to the superficial ethic of "equality" among family members and to the general intellectualized nature of his attempt to mute authority by a pseudo-philosophy of togetherness, when authority is in fact assumed by the father engenders a vagueness in role definitions, confusion in behavioral expectations, and an intellectualization of the relationship.
