Abstract : It is argued that the persistent marginalization of gender sensitive measures points to gendered patterns in the administration of development. Small-scale changes with policies or projects futile in the absence of more fundamental institutional change. Development institutions and organizations must be reformed, being deeply gendered in their structure, and strategies to institutionalize women's interests and gender-sensitive accountability in development must be oriented institutional transformation. A gendered analysis of development organization of different institutional arenas from the state to the community is offered. gendered dynamics structuring bureaucracies at the state level, and at the level where multilateral organizations are located. It also explores gendered dynamics in the less formally bureaucratized arena of NGOs, including women organizations. It builds a conceptual framework for exploring the gendered procedures internal to the institutions which design and implement gender then applies this to the analysis of empirical case study material.
