Abstract : This book calls for a marrying of ecological protection with meeting the needs of the world's poor. It is argued that the developed world's concern for the environment appears to the Third World as a diversion from the real issues: economic inequality and the exploitation of the poor. Yet the poor are often hardest hit by the environmental changes. Behind famine lies the transformation of forests into deserts and fertile soil into wasteland. Behind this devastation lies the political reality of the poor forced to live in a world of ecological crisis.

nature to eat. In exploring the solutions to this vicious circle, chapters look at the impact of survival; deforestation; hunger and the world food supply; 1992, trade agreements; reliance; debt; and development aid that together help to keep the Third World. The short-term 'development' that destroys the resources on which the poor's lasting economic progress depend is rejected.
