Abstract

Landscape portrayal in film and in comics influences our understanding and perception of the world. The cityscape of the movie Dick Tracy (1990) is Warren Beatty's interpretation of the cityscape portrayed in Chester Gould's (1930) comic strip of the same name. Each rendition offers clues to the social milieu in which they were created. Both cityscapes are generic, reflect anti-urban sentiment, and offer a simplistic, moralistic view of reality.

IT IS IMPORTANT FOR GEOGRAPHERS to study landscapes in media. In today's information-rich society, a majority of knowledge and attitudes about specific places and people derive from secondary information sources, such as film, and not from first-hand experience (Burgess and Gold 1985, Ittelson 1973, Jenkins and Youngs 1983). These media-based images, integral to popular culture, mold our perception and experience of the world, create and maintain stereotypes, shape relationships between people and place, and may even
