Abstract:

The article aims to explore the human and intellectual relationship between C.G. Jung and M. Eliade through the documents and their correspondence, with particular emphasis on a subtly problematic stage of it. Starting from the Eranos meeting in 1950, the two scholars have developed a mutual, increasing interest in each other's field of research. From different perspectives, Eliade and Jung dealt with the psychic surfacing of archetypal constants: but the Jungian collective unconscious does not coincide with that of the transconscious in the Eliade's view. In particular, a discussion (which took place in 1955) about the symbolism of the mandala highlights, alongside the undeniable convergence of their approach to the phenomenon of the sacred, their different theoretical and philosophical assumptions and their different conception of the phenomenology of the unconscious psyche (which for Jung stemmed from the emphasis on autonomous dynamism, while for Eliade it was partly inspired by the relationship between Prakrti and Purusa in Yoga).
