Abstract

Migration in Europe is a pressing social and political issue for the present. Drawing upon a wide body of language, expertise and analysis, this is an important survey with a series of detailed country studies on migration.

The authoritative overview essay by the editors examines migration in Europe. They compare the flow during the last forty years with the present, and discuss the magnitude and geography of migration over this period. The book features individual country studies each of which features an historical introduction to immigration in the featured country, quantitative data sets and a discussion of social and political implications. These studies - specially prepared for the book - cover the United Kingdom, France, Germany, The Netherlands, Switzerland, Hungary, Poland, Bulgaria, the former Yugoslavia, and the former USSR.

This comprehensive and scholarly book will be welcomed by teachers of social sciences and history for presenting new insights into one of the most important economic issues facing modern Europe.
