Abstract

Stephanie Newell's multifaceted study of Ghanaian popular fiction is an ambitious project that does more than provide textual readings. It includes chapters on Ghanaian readers' comments, on contemporary Ghanaian literature in West Africa, on parallels between Ghanaian and British literature, and on discussions of specific authors, styles, and texts. This book gives a detailed account of the emergence of a popular literature in a given postcolonial context. It also discusses popular fiction carried out by scholars like Richard Priebe, an

Obiechina did for Onitsha Market Literature in the 1970s, with contemporary theory. While readers who think of African literature might be disappointed, Newell's strategy addresses issues that remain central to literatures, namely: who reads and how, who writes and how,
