Abstract

Essentially a critique of Geertz's Religion of Java, which claimed that Islam has never really taken hold in Java except among a small community of merchants. Argues that Islam is the predominant force in the religious beliefs and rites of central Javanese, and that it shapes the character of social interaction and daily life in all segments of Javanese society. This penetration was achieved so quickly and completely because Islam was embraced by the royal courts as the basis for a theocratic state. Sufism forms the core of the state cult and the theory of kingship, with religious discord based on the age-old Islamic question of how to balance the legalistic and mystical dimensions of the tradition. The chapters examine: texts and ethnography, Java and the Islamic tradition, Sufism, royal and village religion, the
