This review essay examines works of Russian and Soviet Jewish History by Eugene Avrutin, Oleg Budnitskii, and Y relationship between Jews and the state during the “long” Russian twentieth century. The works examine this relationship the late imperial era proceeding the revolutions of 1917; the era of the Russian Civil War; and the late Soviet era of Challenging interpretations of Soviet historiography that have emphasized the open inclusion of Jews in the Soviet stress the need to reconsider the persistence of racial discourses and anti-Semitism that structured relations between after the Bolshevik revolution.
