Explicitness or implicitness as assumed properties of translated texts and other texts in multilingual communication have been the object of speculation and, at a later stage, of more systematic research in linguistics and translation studies. This article undertakes an investigation of explicitness/implicitness and related phenomena of translated texts on the level of corpus-based research architecture, embedded in an empirical research methodology, will be outlined, and first results and conclusions will be discussed. The paper starts with a terminological clarification of the concepts of 'explicitness' and 'explicitation' and their dependent variables to be investigated. The two terms — and their usage by other scholars — will be discussed. A methodology will then be described which provides the empirical data and techniques for information extraction. For the investigation of our corpus, indicators will then be derived on the basis of which operationalizations and hypotheses can be formulated. The explicitation occurring between source and target texts. Some initial results relating to cohesive explicitness and explicitation will be presented and discussed, with particular attention being paid to the areas of 'reference', 'substitution', 'ellipsis', and 'lexical cohesion'. First attempts will also be made at explaining the findings.
