Abstract : A study is made of organizational adjustments made during the 1950s to transform the collective sector of Soviet agriculture from a centralized de-centralized model to a semi-decentralized and monetized pattern. The kolkhoz has increased in scope and permanence, and the farm chairman has increased decision-making authority within the planning methodology. Accounting techniques have been introduced and a higher qualified individual than previously is now becoming available for farm management.

positions, through incentives of improved managerial rewards and increase tenure. Initial gains from these changes have not been great however, because of the failure to generate necessary complementary changes in the system and the lack of applying knowledge of industrial administration to the agricultural sector.
