Abstract : There is growing sense that the media have failed to serve the development, and in particular have not reflected either the concerns or needs of rural populations in Third World countries. Theatre, however, is now being used to encourage increasing popular participation in the development process. This book examines the experiences of extension workers in the use of theatre-for-development as a specifically looks at the attempts of the Marotholi Travelling Theatre based in Lesotho to develop a new model of theatrical communication. The structures of communication are to be democratized, increasing participation, promoting equity, self-reliance and reducing the gap between the people and government. Theatre in Africa has potential as a democratic medium because it can enable audience participation, integrate traditional popular systems of communication and use whatever local resources are available. If theatre is to play a role in the development process, then a careful and well-thought-out methodology is needed in order that genuine two-way communication is developed and cultural forms of expression are enhanced. A realistic awareness of the financial and political constraints that can undermine even the best conceived projects is essential.
